Social Divide: Pursuing progress has spawned a vast social divide in Singapore.

Amongst the things Singapore has bited for the sake of progress, social inequality forms a significant portion. The division between the numerous social groups ~~at~~ within the nation has experienced growth in the distance & between them. Be it culture, education, work or dining, these communities are growing steadily apart, emulating continental drift. A striking piece of evidence for this is the architecture of this country. Foreign workers are often confined to cramped dormitories, packed like a can of sardines, yet wealthy socialites sit in their ivory towers, potentially never meeting one another at all. This social exclusion ~~seems~~ is detrimental to our society, potentially prompting unrest whether between the races or the classes of Singapore, hence paints a negative impression for the pursuit of progress.
